

IF OSHA SHOWS UP

Seven steps. First ten minutes. Do not skip any of them.

1

Ask them to wait

Greet the inspector professionally. Ask them to wait in the lobby or outside while you contact your safety consultant. You are not required to begin the inspection immediately.

Say: 'Thank you for coming. I need to make a brief call to our safety consultant before we begin. Can you give me a few minutes?'

2

Call GigLine immediately

(336) 329-8899 — Call Vince before you do anything else. Before you look at their credentials. Before you call your boss. Before you say anything substantive.

If Vince does not answer, leave a voicemail and text the word OSHA to (336) 329-8899.

3

Ask for credentials and the reason for the visit

Request the inspector's OSHA credentials and ask whether the inspection is programmed (routine) or unprogrammed (complaint-based or referral). Write down their name, badge number, and the stated reason.

You have the right to know why they are there. This information matters.

4

Notify your supervisor or owner

Call the facility owner or your direct supervisor immediately. They should be present or reachable by phone for the duration of the inspection.

Do not proceed with an opening conference until you have made this call.

5

Opening conference — listen more than you speak

The inspector will explain the scope of the inspection. Listen carefully. Take notes. Do not volunteer information beyond what is asked. Do not agree to expand the scope of the inspection.

You are not required to answer questions that go beyond the stated scope of the inspection.

6

Accompany the inspector at all times

A management representative must accompany the inspector during the walkaround. Do not leave them unaccompanied. Take your own notes and photographs of everything the inspector photographs.

Employees have the right to speak privately with the inspector. Do not interfere with this.

7

Document everything

After the inspection, write down everything that was observed, photographed, or discussed — while it is still fresh. Note every citation, every question asked, and every document requested.

Call GigLine again after the inspection closes to discuss next steps before the citation window expires.

What This Document Proves

Having a documented inspection protocol demonstrates to OSHA that your facility takes compliance seriously. Facilities that respond professionally and consistently to inspections receive fewer citations and lower penalties. Post this document near your front entrance where the first person to greet a visitor will see it.
